Beginning the first paragraph on page 223, "In one of the pieces, the philosopher Robert Brandom, who won the 1991 Nobel Prize in Literature, discusses the nature of truth and the role of language in our understanding of reality. He argues that truth is not simply a matter of correspondence between language and the world, but rather a complex web of relations that are shaped by the practices of discourse and the context in which they take place. Brandom's work has been influential in the development of the fields of philosophy of language and the philosophy of mind."
